Segmented labor market in the context of demographic situation and sociological dimension

The article presents a sociological view of the theory of segmented labor market by Michael Piore based on the analysis of current demographic situation in the Far-Eastern regions of the country, in particular in the Khabarovsk territory, which indicates an increase in the rate of population decline and an increase in the use of foreign labor in the region. Based on the analysis of results of sociological research, as well as personal observations, the segment of labor market in which foreign labor is actively used is characterized, and the motivation of foreign citizens to work is determined. Sociological analysis of the attitudes of local population to labor migrants indicates the readiness of the local population to integrate migrants into the regional community.

Keywords: migration, migrants, international migration, foreign labor force, labor market, the Khabarovsk territory, regional community, theory of segmented labor market by M. Piore.
